Return Is Delayed. As, moreover, Western institutions, or at least those in smaller towns, can have no recourse to clearing-house certificates or such other expedients in time of trouble as could be utilized in large cities, another reason exists why they maintain high reserves. More or less heed therefore is being paid to the suggestion that under all these circumstances the return of the vast sums of money sent from the Eastern seaboard to the West within the last two months may be somewhat de-A great share of this money, however, was sent West not because of any financial exigency, but for the ordinary purposes of the yearly crop moving, and there seems no reason why these funds should not be returned at the usual time to their accustomed channels, and it does not seem possible as if the month At of January could pass without some de-

This tells the story in a word, and it arranges, too, like a mathematical proposition, the question that must be settled concerning the future of the stock market in the few months immediately ahead. It may be assumed that money in this period can be obtained with much greater freedom than during the five or six months before that time.

But to how great an extent will purchasers of stock be retarded by diminis upon the time when the investment market improves.
